author is clearly indicated at the end of the first paragraph of his Magna Carta address where he says, "This ceremony must again emphasize the truth that everything which has power to win the obedience and respect of men must have its roots deep in the past, and that the more slowly institutions have grown so much the more enduring are they likely to prove." In several of the addresses there is an authoritative and convincing defence of the courts against the unjust and ignorant criticism to which they have been subjected during recent years. The author presents his views in a manner which holds the reader's attention throughout, and the volume will be found to be valuable by all who are interested in the many-sided problems of modern government and of constitutional law.
